

Cmag's

summer lookbook

With the warmest season approaching, people flock to outdoor activities, and the outfits that follow are one-of-a-kind

Social media can create the impression that a gratifying summer break means flying across the world. In reality, core memories can be just as easily made at home.

Try buying a pack of strawberries while they are in season, lay out a blanket at a local park. Watch a Giants game in July, or a 49ers game in August. Find adventure in your own neighborhood.

In recent years, record-breaking heat waves have made going outside a chore. Make the choice to spend your evenings on a hike or take your bike out for a ride in the morning.

The pressure to be productive dictates many students' plans, confining them to their rooms to write college essays or study for their upcoming classes.

This summer, it is important to put aside the laptops and spend some time with our loved ones. Remember when summer used to mean sidewalk chalk and lemonade stands.

